

Finding Light Again: Rajminder's Malhi Journey

27.7.2026 - | Ipsen

For Rajminder, the past five years have been marked by challenges that affected every aspect of her life. As a mother and a wife, she struggled to fully participate in the moments that mattered most, while navigating a condition that proved difficult to treat.

After several unsuccessful treatment attempts, she found herself running out of options. Conversations with her healthcare team increasingly focused on what could come next and whether another treatment might be able to make a difference.

When she finally started a treatment that worked for her, the impact was felt far beyond symptom management. It enabled her to regain parts of her daily life that she had lost over the years: spending time with family and friends, enjoying everyday activities and, most importantly, being present for her daughter.

Those experiences have given Rajminder a unique perspective on the impact medicines can have on patients and their families. Having lived through the uncertainty of failed treatments and the life-changing difference of finding one that worked, she understands firsthand what is at stake for people waiting for new therapeutic options.

Today, that personal experience brings a deeper meaning to her role at Ipsen. Knowing what it feels like to be a patient searching for answers, she is reminded every day of the importance of the work being done across the organization. For her, it is not just about developing and delivering medicines. It is about helping people regain moments, opportunities and experiences that may have once seemed out of reach.

Looking back, Rajminder reflects on how difficult it was to imagine a brighter future during her toughest moments. Today, however, she sees her journey differently. It has reinforced her appreciation for the people working to advance treatment options and strengthened her belief in the difference those efforts can make in patients' lives.

Rajminder's story is a powerful reminder that behind every medicine is a human story, and that for some patients, finding the right treatment can open the door to an entirely new chapter.
